One might take the upshot of Dennett’s story to be that there are no good answers to the persistence questions. That is, perhaps I do not actually persist through time at all. The idea that I—my “self”—does not persist through time is an old idea that also shares some underlying philosophy traditions, too.

Socrates once said: “I know that I know nothing.” We can never take Socrates’ claim for granted, as we are all in some way “Socrates imitators.”
